July 23, 2014 Topic
"Getting Requirements Right...The First Time"

Albert Einstein once said, If I can't see it, I can't understand it. This is the basis for utilizing visualization tools in the requirements gathering phase of software development projects.

Most projects that fail are due to miscommunication between the business stakeholders and the development team. Visualization tools combat this, allowing you to quickly see your software solution before a single line of code is written. Advanced visualization tools enable extremely rapid prototyping with online publishing and critiquing that can cut the time and cost of requirements gathering in half.

Visualization tools make traditional requirements sessions appear heavy and arduous. The resulting simulation is so rich in functionality that you can actually show your stakeholders what they are going to get. In fact, the prototype is so robust that it can be used for training purposes while the development effort is underway.

This seminar is designed to discuss tools that engage stakeholders and get the requirements right, the first time, before development begins.
